SUMMARY

As land professionals in land administration, we are especially aware of the strong emotive ties of people to land, including ownership, kinship, belongingness, culture, and pride. As the world faces drastic and evolving shifts in land resources, climate, and social structures, resilient land administration structures and the professionals who establish and maintain them must be able to respond to these shifts in a technical fashion without losing sight of the emotional purpose. This presentation explores how to keep people at the centre of the climate actions.
